September 9th—Monday—1:15 a.m.

I just woke up with a cold spooky feeling running through me. At first I couldn't figure out what it was and pulled myself deeper under my covers and put my pillow over my head, but the shivers just got worse . . . then I realized Mom and Dad were fighting again! I HATE IT . . . HATE IT . . . HATE IT . . . when they do that!

I can't understand a single bit of what they are saying, but the feelings come through like giant rocks and electric shocks and fire darts. I want it to stop!!! Stop!!! Stop!!! I hate it! And I hate them for doing it! I don't really hate them. Actually, I want, with all my might, to run into their room and snuggle up in their bed with them. Me in the middle being kissed and hugged and spoiled like when I was little.

Whatever happened to our loving, happy little family that used to play hide-and-seek in the house and have picnics on the floor in front of the fireplace on rainy days? And do all the fun nice things that we always used to do? Like talk and talk and talk and talk.

Monday—7:00 a.m.

My stupid old alarm clock just woke me up with its stupid old song, "Oh, What a Beautiful Morning." It's hardly that! My pillow is all wet and soggy with tears and I'm as tired as if I had just climbed Mount Everest. I guess I cried myself to sleep again last night. I hate that!

Monday—7:36 a.m.

I just got out of the shower and finished drying my hair and I AM SO EMBARRASSED! How could I have felt all those horrible hating things about Mom and Dad last night?

As the warm bubbly water splashed and gurgled over my body it washed all the badness away and made me think more like a sane person instead of like a dumb little kid. They have a right to disagree about things just like I do! They aren't clones. They don't have to just say "yes sir" or "yes ma'am" to each other to death about every little thing. Bridget and I sometimes have almost screaming matches over who played the best at some of our hockey games and other stuff that's not all that important, so why couldn't Mom and Dad have just been arguing about a movie they'd seen or Mom's alcoholic sister Meg, who comes by occasionally and drives us all crazy, or . . . there are a million things . . . oh, I'm such a worrywart, look-for-trouble, negative, dumbhead sometimes.
